Mickey Rooney has come to the conclusion, "Everyone is basically suicidal. We're all looking for an escape. Some find it in booze or drugs. Others find salvation in religion. But few ever get the courage to analyze themselves objectively - and accept that they are responsible for all that's gone wrong in their lives.",

As for his own life, he says, "So many dastardly, catastrophic things have happened it's just lucky I'm resilient." He has gone through a lot - including bankruptcy in the early '60s, the arrest of a son for narcotics possession. And seven failed marriages. He feels lucky to have found religion, and though he confesses, "I've spit in God's face a thousand times, and likely will do so again. He has pulled me through and helped me achieve peace and contentment."

Dressed in convict's attire for his role in Stanley Kramer's "The Domino Principle" feature, his hair gray, his 5-foot-3 frame chunky, the 54-year-old actor bears little resemblance to the cute, captivating Andy Hardy character he played in many movies of the '30s and '40s.

He feels that his marital track record is "disgusting." The problem's been, he says, that "I've somehow never managed to combine love and friendship - and love without the latter is just lust.

"I don't really approve of divorce, it's sad. But the trouble is that everyone is ready to take all they can get from a relationship - without being ready to give."

Divorced this last time since 1975, Mickey currently is in quest of wife No. 8. But this time, he insists, he's more concerned about selecting a mate who'll be a good friend, than a good lover. He's learned his lesson, he points out, after seven journeys down that other, 'suicidal' path.
